General Lee's Kindness of Heart.

A kinsman of mine, who fought on the losing side in the late war, gave me

One day my Colonel invited me to accompany him to headquarters, which I was the barry of hear somepany him to headquarters, which I was very glad to do, hoping to hear something of my family in Richmond, whom the General—recently in that city—knew well. We found him sitting at the door of his tent, which was pitched at the top of a rather steep hill. Has gave us a good of the steep hill. He held it in his hand without breaking the seal, and said to the sol-dier: 'You have ridden your horse hard and he is very much distressed; un-buckle the girths and let him breathe."

Another and more striking illustra-tion of this tenderness of heart in the great commander occurred at Petersburg during the closing weeks of the riege. Gen. Lee's headquarters was in a private house beyond the reach, it was thought, of the Federal artillery. One morning he was standing, with several of his staff, under a large tree, when a heavy shell landed not far dis-"Gentlemen," he said, "the enemy have evidently got in range, and we had better retire." Of course, nobody would retire until the chief set the example. The next moment au-other shell crashed through the top of the tree above their heads, and all owed his advice-except himself. AN ALLIGATOR'S REVENUE,-An alligator story which beats the record comes from Early county, Ga. Some negroes were at work in a turpentine farm near Damascus cleaning the trash and straw away from the boxes preparatory to burning off the woods, when they came across an alligator who had crawled out during the last warm spell to put on his new spring suit, but who was knocked back into a state of dormancy by the recent cold

The old fellow was lying there stiff, hard, motionless and crusty, and the negroes decided that they would make an end of him by burning him up; so they dipped turpentine out of the boxes and covered him over entirely with that inflammable substance, and then heaped pine straw on top of him what he supposed was the land of the perennial summer, where the bad gaters go. Nevertheless, instinct was stronger than intellect, and Old Crusty ecided that, even though he were in hell, he would split for a pound. He splitted, and through the pine woods he went, leaving a long streak of fire. His rapid flight to the pound gave him the appearance of a gorgeous meteor loating away, leaving behind it a tail

A minute later (the trail of fire was a mile long) the 'gator was rolling over and under in the cooling waters of a cpyress pond, but the woods were burning up. The festive darkies, who burning up. The festive darkies, who a minute before were waiting and watching in unfeigned glee to see the gator burn, were now busy fighting fire. After a long while they succeeded in putting it out, but ten crops of boxes had been destroyed.
